SITE SAFETY AT THE EAGLE GOLD MINE

A culture of health, safety and wellness at the Eagle Gold Mine is a core principle of the Victoria Gold team.

As of May 1, the Eagle Gold Mine had achieved over 560 days and 2,000,000 hours without a Lost Time Incident (LTI).

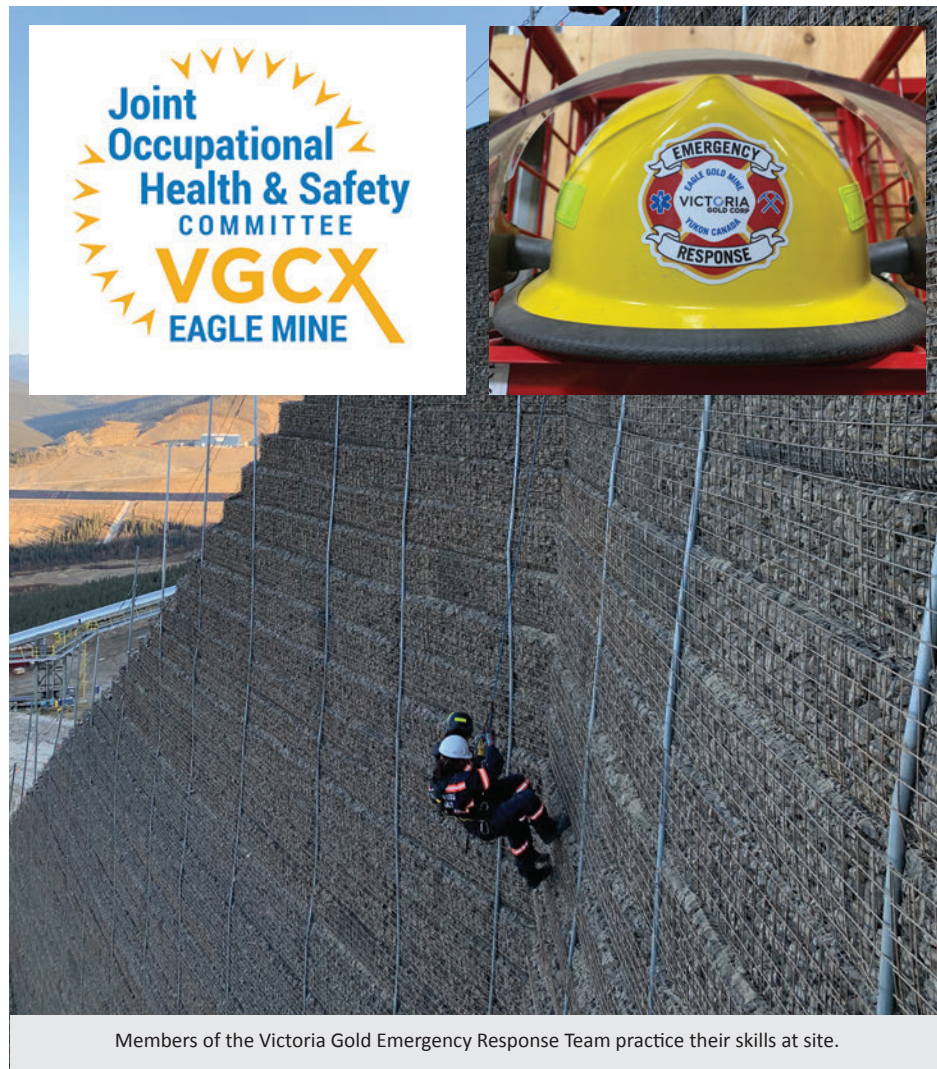

“Victoria Gold is committed to the health and safety of our employees and visitors at the Eagle Gold Mine and across our operations and we continue to look out for one another at work each and every day,” says Victoria Gold President & CEO John McConnell. “Providing a safe work environment conducive to the maintenance of good health is a primary objective of our business.”

On April 28, site personnel reflected upon fallen and injured workers across the country on Yukon’s Day of Mourning and renewed their commitment to health and safety in the workplace. The territory passed the Day of Mourning for Victims of Workplace Injuries Act in 2002. This day coincides with the 70th anniversary of the federal Workers’ Compensation Act; the result of the Meredith Report, which was tabled by Sir William Meredith in 1913 laying the foundation for workers’ compensation in Canada.

Victoria Gold’s Occupational Health and Safety policy is available on the Company’s web site. At the mine, the Joint Occupational Health and Safety Committee (JOHCS) provides leadership and direction to promote and sustain the health and safety of all workers and serves as a resource to all site departments by engaging and supporting education, training and health and safety awareness to ensure a positive safety culture.

The Company’s Emergency Response Team (ERT) – or Mine Rescue Team – is made up of volunteers from various departments across site. ERT members are a dedicated group which take part in weekly training sessions. These individuals are required by Yukon Occupational Health and Safety to be certified in various skills such as first aid, rope rescue and firefighting.

“At Victoria Gold, we respect our employees and contractors, the environment and the communities in which we operate,” continues McConnell.
